

THE ADMINISTRATION

J. E. BROWN
Superintendent of Lancaster City Schools
B.S., Ohio University
M.A., Ohio State

Today's Challenge

The maximal development of human resources is the challenge facing the leading nations of the world. Only in a great democratic nation like America, where over forty million young people attend school, is it possible for the individual to find such a wealth of opportunity for individual advancement or personal fulfillment. It is axiomatic that from our great human resources will evolve the leadership required to meet the challenge which faces us this day.

All of us strive constantly and diligently for the improvement and betterment of our fellowman. People today function in an increasingly collaborative society; however, there is an urgent need for dynamic individuals who are unafraid to launch forward into the outer fringes of the great unknown of our electronic age. There is paramount need for unselfish, unique leadership to show us the way.

The happiness of individuals is important and desirable; however, the survival of our American way of life is the challenge we thrust upon our youth this day. It is particularly important that our American form of democracy be sustained, for then only can there be happiness and security for any of us.

Each educator finds satisfaction in observing the successes of the individual student or any class of students. Teachers have a feeling of unlimited pride when they hear about an instant of guidance, inspiration, or motivation which may have changed the life of an individual student. In this class are found many reasons for us to be proud.

J. E. BROWN
Superintendent of Schools

ROBERT W. PAYNE
Assistant Superintendent
B.S., Ohio Northern
M.E., Ohio State